

The violin is just one of the many musical instruments that continually capture the interests of those who have some passion for music. If you have finally decided to concentrate on learning how to play it, then, now is the best time to start with your endeavor.

Being a beautiful instrument, it will take much of your time, effort, and dedication to be able to play it efficiently. There are a myriad of things that you need to learn prior to being successful in playing a single note. Some of these are your posture, your physical, emotional, and mental preparedness, and your inner desire to make it work.

You can always improve. It is not because you are a newbie that there is no more room left for your own improvement. This is the prime reason as to why you are attempting to learn this craft. In anything that you do, you always start at the bottom before you finally hit it right. Hence, take a look at the following beginner's tips that will be of great help in your desire to play the violin.

Focus on your goal. Obviously, your goal is that of learning how to use the bow so you can produce sounds from the violin. This will never be possible if don't pay any attention or dedicate your effort to whatever it is that you want to do. Whether it is just a hobby for you or you have an ambition to become a great violinist someday, it takes time and effort on your part to learn the fundamentals.

Seek an instructor. Although books and online courses are popular these days, nothing can compare with having a live teacher beside you all through your learning process. This expert knows everything that you should also learn. Thus, it is important to work with someone that you are comfortable to be with.

Never play the violin with your long fingernails. For safety purposes, cut your nails before holding this instrument. It is not only going to be difficult on your part but handling the strings as well as the fingerboard should be done with utmost care. It is very uncomfortable to reach through the strings and apply pressure if you have long fingernails. More so, the sound that you will produce will also be affected.

Respect your musical instrument. If you truly want to improve in your craft, give your violin the due respect that it deserves. Don't throw tantrums whenever you feel bad about your practice. Don't swing it around or else you might break its neck. Treat it like any of your prized possessions.

Keep your hands off the hairs on the bow. The hairs are very delicate so don't play with them. The natural oils that emanate from your fingers can damage the bow. Also, prevent the rosin from getting in touch with the hairs. If all of these circumstances happen, you might have a need to replace the hairs.

The bow is only for your violin. Don't let it touch any other thing.

Don't slouch when playing. Your posture can affect how you execute the proper bowing, fingering, as well as the sound that must be produced.

Keep your bowing straight. Practice this good habit as early as now.

These are among the vital tips that a beginner like you should keep in mind. Remember that playing the violin is fun. So, start now!
